

Poets and Priests: The Victorian Era

The nineteenth century was a crucial period for the revival of pagan beliefs and practices, and nowhere more so than in England. To enter Victorian England is to step into a place of profound religious change and disturbance. Traditional Christian culture was under siege as never before, facing intellectual challenges from the outside in the form of science and scepticism and from the inside in the form of liberalizing theology from Germany. In public life, the once formidable legal privileges of the Anglican church were reduced and diminishing. Meanwhile, throughout the country, the social upheavals of industrialization broke the organic links between people, place and parish that had been fundamental to the English religious experience for centuries. Given this ferment of social and religious change, and given that resources from ancient paganism continued to persist in contemporary culture, it was unsurprising that some people would seek to reactivate those resources in order to help with thinking about and living in the emerging modern world—or in order to avoid doing so.

The religious history of the Victorian age is sometimes told as a flat, monochrome narrative of progress: a pious evangelical form of Christianity retreating in the face of Charles Darwin. And to a certain extent this was true. Evangelical Protestantism did reach its peak and enter decline in this period, and scientistic secularism did take hold in public culture. This was the ‘Sea of Faith’ retreating, as described in Matthew Arnold’s ‘Dover Beach’; or the Victorian Crisis of Faith, to use the title of a well-known book.¹ Yet other creedal options were available beyond orthodox Protestantism and orthodox naturalism. The Victorian era saw continuing outbreaks of the non-rational, Romantic ways of thinking that we met in the last chapter, both in the field of religion and elsewhere. As James Webb wrote:

Just when the Age of Reason seemed to be bearing fruit in the 19th century, there was an unexpected reaction against the very method which had brought success, a wild return to archaic forms of belief,

Timothy Smith,1999-05-30 Despite the development of a consensus foreign policy during the early years of the Cold War that supported containment of the Soviet Union there were both internationalists and pacifists who opposed the efforts of the Truman administration These groups felt that American actions including the Truman Doctrine the Marshall Plan the North Atlantic Treaty and even the Korean War weakened the UN threatened the Soviet Union with war hindered European economic recovery and promoted colonialism Often mislabeled as isolationists both the pacifists with their traditional opposition to war and the liberal internationalists who supported efforts to continue the wartime alliance with the Soviets through the development of a strong UN felt that the United States should play an active role in world affairs The peace movement forces have been marginalized or dismissed as insignificant by many historians however while their impact was minimal in the late 1940s and early 1950s their ideas would later re emerge to have a strong impact on American policy particularly in the ban the bomb and the antiwar movements of the Vietnam era They continued to support efforts to maintain the Soviet alliance through the UN to assist in the reconstruction of the world economy to promote disarmament and to end colonialism While a commitment to these ideas would probably not have prevented the Cold War it might have lessened its severity or slowed the arms race between the United States and the Soviet Union
