

volume, neatly illustrated, and not obviously about to 'self destruct' after a single reading. I found the book compulsive reading. Beginning with an enlightening historical survey of β -lactam antibiotics by Professor Sir E.M. Abraham, we are then presented with a typical tour de force by Dr Tomasz as he reveals the complex range of 'secondary' factors which underlie the bactericidal action of β -lactams. This chapter should be obligatory reading for all who teach, or study, courses on the modes of action of antibiotics. Then, three chapters deal with β -lactam-producing organisms including strain improvement and genetics (although (curiously, since Professor Demail is an editor) there is no discussion of how β -lactam-producing actinomycetes avoid suicide. Next comes biosynthesis of β -lactams (Demail) and regulation of the same (Martin and Abornowicz) before we move into the physiological factors 'biochemical engineering' affecting β -lactam production (Dr Mout). I was then particularly interested in chapters dealing with screening for new β -lactams (Zimmerman and Stapley) and HPLC as applied to β -lactams (Miller and Neuss) before being overwhelmed by some hard-core chemistry dealing with the total synthesis of representative compounds (Christensen and Salzman). To my knowledge, such strength in depth is not matched by any other available text.

There was something for me in every chapter in this book and I recommend it highly to anyone interested in antibacterials in general, let alone β -lactams. I suspect that even the experts in this field (i.e., those experts who did not contribute to this volume) will share my view that no library in the microbial/biochemical/pharmaceutical sciences will be complete without it. Honours students and researchers alike will surely benefit from browsing through the pages (it is that kind of book) and I look forward not only to the companion volume but also to re-reading several of the chapters in the present one.

Structure, Function and Biosynthesis of Plant Cell Walls

Edited by W.M. Dugger and S. Bartnicki-Garcia

American Society of Plant Physiologists, Rockville, MD 20850, USA, 1984

This volume is one in a series of publications by the American Society of Plant Physiology on timely topics in plant physiology and contains the proceedings of the seventh annual symposium in botany - held at the University of California on 12-14 January 1984. There were four sessions concerned with cell wall chemistry and biosynthesis, cell wall hydrolysis and associated physiology, cellular events associated with cell wall biosynthesis, and interaction of plant cell walls with pathogens and related responses. The contributions are published in two sections, one containing the fuller oral presentations and the other, the resumés of poster presentations, both sections being illustrated.

The introduction by Bartnicki-Garcia entitled 'Kingdoms with walls' offers a brief though provocative survey of the many facets of plant cell walls of both prokaryotes and eukaryotes through a consideration of their origins and evolution. In particular, the more general problem of the evolution and gene control of the spatial compartmentation of various steps in the production of cell structures is examined through reference to cell walls and their possible roles in cytomorphogenesis. There follows a consideration, by the participants, of the chemistry, biosynthesis and regulation of the various component molecules involved with plant cell walls. In addition, various features of cell wall lysis by both endogenous and exogenous
