

INTRODUCTION

Many think that Charles Darwin “discovered evolution”, when in fact it was a mechanism for evolutionary change – NATURAL SELECTION – that he proposed. In the On the Origin of Species, he published in 1859, Darwin described natural selection, provided evidence in support of evolution. He defined evolution as a change in populations over time. By 1900, geneticists and naturalists still disagreed about the role of natural selection and the importance of small variations in natural populations. It took the advent of population genetics to allow natural selection to be widely accepted.

Ayala (1982) defined evolution as “changes in the genetic constitution of populations”. A population is defined as a group of organisms of the SAME species that occur in the SAME area and interbreed or share a common gene pool, all the alleles at all gene loci of all individuals in the population. The population is considered to be the basic unit of evolution. Therefore, POPULATIONS EVOLVE, not individuals.

In 1908, G.H. Hardy (an English mathematician) and W. Weinberg (a German physician) developed models of population genetics. They worked independently, but both showed that the process of heredity by itself did not affect the genetic structure of a population.

Today we call their theorem (for all you mathematicians who like theorems, this should be fun) the Hardy-Weinberg theorem. It states that the frequency of alleles in the population will remain the same regardless of the starting frequencies. Furthermore, the equilibrium genotypic frequencies will be established after one generation of random mating. What does this mean?

If H and h are alleles for a particular gene locus and each diploid individual has two such loci, then p can be designated as the frequency of the H allele and q as the frequency of the h allele.

Therefore if you have a population of 100 individuals (each with 2 loci) in which 40% of the alleles are H, then p
