

The Role of Multinational Enterprises in Developing Countries

The Role of Multinational Enterprises in Developing Countries According to the Oxford Dictionary, a developing country is "a poor agricultural country that is seeking to become more advanced economically and socially" (Oxford Dictionaries Online). Multinational Enterprises (MNEs) enable developing countries to achieve these objectives in several different ways. For instance, they introduce foreign products, inject money in the economy, and serve as a learning engine in the communities where they are located. In this essay, I will discuss the positive impact that MNEs have on developing countries through human resource development. MNEs support developing countries' social and economic goals through the improvement of human capital by providing enormous numbers of employment opportunities, useful skills and training for their workers, and a business culture that is aligned with global standards. MNEs bring hundreds of thousands of employment opportunities to their host countries.

This contributes to a higher standard of living for individuals and to improvements in local economies. The unemployment rates in developing countries are generally very high. In 2011, Nigeria, Liberia, Haiti, and several other developing countries, had unemployment rates that were well above 20% (CIA – The World Factbook). Responsible globalisation with the challenge of securing the environment-related and social-oriented services in an increasingly global setting, as well as further developing them with innovative and flexible solutions and projects, represents a contribution to sustainability across the world" (Volkswagen Konzern Startseite). Volkswagen has proceeded to establish an extensive production network that includes facilities in countries such as Brazil, South Africa, India, China and Mexico.

In the city of Puebla, Mexico alone, a Volkswagen production facility employs 13,937 workers (Volkswagen Konzern Startseite). Some indirect opportunities associated with the presence of MNEs include increased business for local vendors, and demand for raw material production. One argument against MNEs is that host countries often become dependent on them. For example, an association comprised of six European firms w
