Abstract: A number of studies have examined the effects of various interventions on the health of children and adolescents with chronic conditions. This paper reviews the literature on the effectiveness of interventions for children and adolescents with chronic conditions, focusing on the impact of interventions on health outcomes, quality of life, and healthcare utilization. The review includes a synthesis of findings from randomized controlled trials, quasi-experimental studies, and qualitative research. The findings suggest that interventions targeting health behaviors, psychosocial factors, and healthcare utilization can lead to improved health outcomes and quality of life for children and adolescents with chronic conditions. However, the effectiveness of interventions may vary depending on the specific condition, the intervention itself, and the characteristics of the population. Further research is needed to identify the most effective interventions for different populations and conditions.
