

Effects of Natural Disasters

- Displaced populations – due to the widespread destruction of buildings and property, many natural disasters leave people without a home. This can cause a massive movement of survivors from one area to another, placing a huge amount of pressure on services such as health care and education.
- Health risks – survivors of natural disasters are often in danger of becoming seriously ill, even after the immediate risk of the disaster event has passed. Health complications resulting from infection and disease can lead to rising death tolls if medical assistance is not readily available to survivors.
- Food shortages – due to the destruction of crops and agricultural supplies, food can become scarce following a natural disaster. Aid organisations play a vital role in ensuring that survivors are provided with the nutritional support they need, including fresh, clean drinking water.
- Emotional trauma – survivors of natural disasters are often at risk of conditions such as PTSD (post-traumatic stress disorder). Children in particular require special treatment to recover from these experiences.
