Transformation from Below?

White Suburbia in the Transformation of Apartheid South Africa to Democracy Ursula Scheidegger, 2015-08-06 South Africa is an example of a relatively successful political transition Nevertheless the first democratic elections in 1994 did not change the systemic and structural inequalities the socioeconomic legacies of discrimination or the alienation of the different population groups At the centre of this study is the transformation potential of two formerly white neighbourhoods in Johannesburg Norwood and Orange Grove Both neighbourhoods have experienced considerable demographic changes and the various population groups differ in terms of their expectations and their willingness to adjust to the changes provoked by the transition At the local level patterns of discrimination and oppression continue Spaces opportunities and leverage of social networks engaged in the community are influenced by the resources people are able to access Moreover cooperation is contested in a context of pervasive inequality because there is no incentive for privileged groups to change arrangements that benefit them In this context of conflicting interests and unequal access to power and resources decentralisation and the promotion of participatory structures in local communities are a problem and the reliance on local networks as agents of development is questionable
