HC 110 - Who's Accountable? Relationships Between Government And Arm's-Length Bodies Great Britain. Parliament. House of Commons. Public Administration Select Committee, 2014 The controversy around the Government's handling of flooding last winter showed that arm's length Government is confused and opaque Organisational forms and names are inconsistent Most public bodies answer to Ministers but some are directly accountable to Parliament There is no agreement on how many types of body exist There are overlaps and blurring between categories Accountability arrangements and reforms so far have been ad hoc The Government has reviewed non departmental public bodies but it should review all forms of arm's length Government including executive agencies and non ministerial departments The Government should establish a clear taxonomy of public bodies constitutional bodies independent public interest bodies departmental sponsored bodies and executive agencies All public bodies should sit in one of the categories so that it is clear how each is to be governed and sponsored This is essential in order to clarify who is accountable for what This would promote understanding of what is expected of relationships and explain the rationale for locating functions in particular organisational forms Up to date plain English statements of statuses roles and relationships are needed even if the underlying arrangements are complicated This is far from the reality in many cases particularly in the NHS With a budget of 95.6 billion NHS England is now by far the largest public body in England and its accountability should not be in any doubt but it is still evolving There is insufficient understanding across Government about how arm's length Government should work
