

Start of the First World War

After the assassination of Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria the rivalry declared over in Serbia on 28th July 1914. Within a week, many European countries had taken sides based on previous alliances. France, Great Britain and Russia formed the major Allied Powers on one side of the war, while the major Central Powers of Austria-Hungary, Germany and the Ottoman Empire were on the other. Italy remained neutral at the beginning of the war. Many people on both sides were confident that they would become quick victors.

Western Front

At the beginning of the conflict, Germany created a strategy called the Schlieffen Plan to fight the war. They planned to invade France through Belgium (a country that was usually neutral in the west). They expected to sweep westward through Belgium, capture Paris and defeat France within only a few weeks. At the same time, their forces were to take a defensive position against Russia in the east and then deal with the Russian forces after defeating France. This plan relied on Russia taking time to prepare its large army for war.

On the 4th August 1914, German troops invaded Belgium. They attacked the fortified city of Liege using powerful weapons called siege cannons, capturing the city in less than two weeks. This took Germans longer than they expected, and their forces suffered heavy losses. The German forces killed many civilians as they moved through Belgium towards France.

The first Battle of the Marne took place in September 1914, only 20 miles from Paris. Germany had hoped to defeat France quickly, but French and British troops drove the German forces back to north-west France.

After their defeat, Germany dug defensive trenches to avoid losing any more ground. The Allied Powers' forces were unable to break through this line of defense, so they also dug trenches. These trenches eventually stretched for 400 miles from Switzerland to the English Channel. Soldiers had to live in terrible conditions, attacked were heavily, infected with rats and ate with diseases. With both sides making no progress, the stalemate on the Western Front would last over three years.
