

Foreword

Foreigners studying Chinese usually learn basic grammatical rules early on. However, as they become more advanced and their vocabulary increases, they encounter difficulties in avoiding mistakes in writing and expressing themselves. This usually puzzles students as the Chinese language appears to be illogical and to follow no rules. There are rules, but some are hard to formulate and there are many exceptions. This is because the Chinese language has no changes that indicate genders, numbers, case, voice, or tense. Instead it is the combination of word order and structural word. This allows the different components of the language to be easily combined but learners often make mistakes. Our teaching experience shows us that the rules of grammar are rigid but the usage allows flexibility. Speaking Chinese: 300 Grammatical Points is based on many years of teaching practice and takes into account the difficulties foreign students have and the mistakes they make. In this book, we have chosen 150 typical mistakes in morphology and syntax. Each grammatical point is presented in pinyin and are explained clearly and concisely in Chinese and in English. We believe that this book would be a great help to all foreigners who wish to study Chinese grammar.

In the process of compiling this book, instructor Wang Xiaoyan translated the morphology part. Here, we would like to express our heartfelt thanks to her for her help.

Drawing on the British Academic Written English corpus, a large corpus of proficient undergraduate student writing collected in the UK in the early 2000s, this study explores Chinese students' written assignments in English in a range of university disciplines, contrasting these with assignments from British students. The study is supplemented by questionnaire and interview datasets with discipline lecturers, writing tutors and students and provides a comprehensive picture of the Chinese student writer today. Theoretically framed through work within academic literacies and lexical priming, the author seeks to explore what we know about Chinese students writing and to extend these findings to undergraduate writing more generally. In a globalized educational environment, it is important for educators to understand differences in writing styles across the student body and to move from the widespread deficit model of student writing towards a descriptive model which embraces different ways of achieving success. Chinese Students Writing in English will be of value to researchers, EAP tutors and university lecturers teaching Chinese students in the UK. Packard, 2012-12-06 A Linguistic Investigation of Aphasic Chinese Speech is the first detailed linguistic analysis of a large body of aphasic Chinese natural speech data. This work describes how the major aphasia syndromes are manifest in Chinese, a language which differs significantly from languages upon which traditional aphasia theory is based. Following the Chinese data, a new explanation for the major aphasia syndromes is offered based on the cognitive science modularity hypothesis. The theory posits that Broca's aphasia is the result of computational deficits that occur within linguistic components, while Wernicke's aphasia is the result of deficits that occur in the transfer of information between components. It is demonstrated how the fluent and non-fluent characteristics of the major aphasia syndromes follow directly from the properties of cognitive modules. Detailed linguistic descriptions of Broca's and Wernicke's aphasia in Chinese are provided, including a summary of diagnostics of aphasia type. The complete corpora of four aphasic Chinese speakers, including interlinear and free translations, are presented in an Appendix. The Far East Christian Ottomar Arndt, United States.
