The Life of a Colonial Child

The life of a colonial child was rough, but not lonely. Families were large, because there had to be enough children to help with chores. Children began doing physical labor after their sixth birthdays.

They had few free moments to themselves. Boys had to rise before school to bring in firewood, feed the pigs, and water the horses. After school, they had to pick berries, gather vegetables, shell corn, and put them on spits.

Learning to read and write was considered unimportant for girls. Most were unable to go to school with their brothers. They worked hard at home, so as not to disappoint their parents. Girls had to pick feathers off live geese for stuffed pillows, mend clothes, spin thread, weave baskets, knit, milk the cows, make brooms, feed the chickens, gather eggs, and churn butter.

At night, daughters had to sew the clothes for their brothers.
