Estimating Postfire Water Production in the Pacific Northwest Donald F. Potts, David Lawrence Peterson, Hans R. Zuuring, 1989 Two hydrologic models were adapted to estimate postfire change in water yield in Pacific Northwest watersheds The WRENS version of the simulation model PROSPER is used for hydrologic regimes dominated by rainfall it calculates water available for streamflow on the basis of seasonal precipitation and leaf area index The WRENS version of the simulation model WATBAL is used for hydrologic regimes dominated by snowfall it calculates water available for streamflow based on seasonal precipitation energy aspect and cover density The PROSPER and WATBAL models estimate large postfire increases in water available for streamflow only for fires that have removed more than 50 percent of the leaf area are cover density respectively Guidelines for selecting appropriate models and tables and figures for calculating postfire water yield are presented This simulation approach should be useful for estimating long term effects of fire on water production within the framework of land management planning
