These findings have broader implications for educational practice. For example, the findings suggest that teachers should be encouraged to use a variety of assessment methods, including self-assessment, peer assessment, and assessment by others, to provide a more comprehensive picture of student learning. The findings also suggest that teachers should be encouraged to use assessment as a tool for learning, rather than just a tool for grading. This can be done by providing students with feedback on their work, and by using assessment to identify areas where students need more support. Finally, the findings suggest that teachers should be encouraged to use assessment to inform their instruction. This can be done by using assessment data to identify areas where students are struggling, and by adjusting instruction accordingly.
