Abstract

In the last decade, studies related to linguistics and the use of structural linguistic methods in architecture and urban planning have become widespread, and many thinkers have conducted research in this field. What is proposed as the grammar of urban design is an abstract concept based on inference from different objective examples of urban spaces (in a morphological and typological analysis) and not an examination of a single example, which is actually the individual speech of an artist who is considered an architect and city planner.

The main elements of the city's skeleton, which form the city network, are identification tools and milestones at the city level, which are used with their specific spatial organization to create a mental memory. With the help of the symbolic foundation of the city, a communication network is formed in which there is a flow, which has an important place in the visual-spatial feature of the main skeleton of the city.

Within the scope of the main skeleton of the city, the urban space finds its coordinates. From the perspective of urban structuralist linguistics, physical and form aspects are mentioned as determining factors, along with aspects of semantic perception. According to this approach, these formal characteristics should include the whole city and provide semantic coherence, but because the investigation of infrastructures is not followed through typology and does not consider closedness and self-sustainability, not all infrastructures are necessarily included; therefore, in identifying the structure of a city, the three main morphological, typological, and semantic approaches can be followed, as well as the fourth approach, which is a combination of two morphological and semantic approaches, but in order to achieve a clear understanding of the structure of a city, with the approach adopted another and that is the combination of all three main thinkers. In other words, using a morphological approach, he determined the structure of the city, and based on a typological approach, he clarified its components and defined this structure from the semantic dimension. While none of the three main approaches alone can explain the structure of a city, applying and placing them in front of each other provides a clear framework for adopting a spatial approach in which the structure of the city is determined.

In this case, it is possible to determine the morphological totality of the structure and examine it from the perspective of its semantic integrity. Simultaneously, from the perspective of the second approach and with the typology of elements, the correctness of the definition of the structure under investigation can be shown.
