This review identifies the "most valuable" literature sources from among the many titles concerned with rural energy in the Third World. The annotated bibliography critiques more than 150 sources and lists others that focus on the social science aspects of the problem. Two introductory chapters explore the needs of energy users and look at the problems of rural poverty, and of organizing indigenous technical change for the generation of technologies suitable to the rural environment. The book is the result of a joint project of the Science Policy Research Unit at the University of Sussex, United Kingdom, and the International Development Research Centre, a public corporation established by the Canadian Parliament.

Brown, Lester R. U.S. and Soviet Agriculture: The Shifting Balance of Power. Washington, DC: Worldwatch Paper 51, October 1982. 48 pp.; $2.00 (pb).

Although most attention to United States-Soviet relations focuses on competition in the arms race, the weakness of Soviet agriculture is becoming an increasingly important factor in the balance of power between the two countries. Worldwatch Institute director Lester R. Brown outlines the deep-seated managerial and economic failures that contribute to the deterioration of Soviet agriculture, and predicts that the Soviets will need widespread reforms to put a halt to the massive importation of American grain. The Soviets now import nearly one-fourth of their grain, and over half of this comes from North America, which is experiencing great agricultural successes. Brown asserts that the new economic ties between American farmers and Soviet dinner tables "provide an opportunity to reshape relations with the Soviets." The economic interdependence could lead to new cooperation and, as the prospect of destroying its principal source of imported grain would be a deterrent to a Soviet nuclear attack, the United States could use the Soviet dependence to slow down the arms race.

Immanuel Kant, in his Critique of Pure Reason, captured humankind's uncertainty about its orientation to ultimate place and purpose with three basic questions: what can we know? what ought we to do? and what can we hope for? The interrelationships among these questions and the uncertainties of their answers "define our cultural
