Abstract

This study uses a visualization technique, systemism, to integrate ICB Project findings about crisis, escalation and war in particular. The domain of the analysis, 1999–2017, is the period following the authoritative review of research in Michael Brecher (1999; International studies in the twentieth century and beyond: Flawed dichotomies, syntheses, cumulation, International Studies Quarterly 43: 213–264) up to the present. Systemism is used to combine, in graphic form, substantively significant results from ICB Project research. Insights about cause and effect for escalation processes are obtained that would not readily be available in the absence of graphic representation. This learning is made possible through application of systemism, a visualization technique, to convey a network of variables leading into war.

Keywords

Crisis, escalation, graphic method, International Crisis Behavior Project, systemism

Crisis, escalation and war are concepts at the center of peace science as a field of study. Since its inception in 1975, the International Crisis Behavior (ICB) Project stands out for its sustained effort toward theory and evidence regarding the concepts above. ICB Project research offers theoretical models and datasets that have facilitated a vast amount of research on causes, processes and consequences of crises in world politics. The goal of the present study is to use a visualization technique, systemism, to integrate together ICB Project findings about crisis, escalation and war in particular. The domain of the analysis, 1999–2017, is the period following the authoritative review of research in Brecher (1999) up to the present. Systemism is used to combine, in graphic form, substantively significant results from ICB Project research. Causal mechanisms are conveyed via systemism to provide a more comprehensive explanation for how crisis, escalation and war relate to each other. Insights about cause and effect for escalation processes are obtained that would not readily be available in
