

The Study of Soviet Foreign Policy: Ideology and Foreign Policy Analysis

Jonathan Haslam

Soviet foreign policy has been studied in two parts of the world—East and West—on basically different assumptions in entirely different settings. The study of foreign policy that I am concerned with here is that carried on in the West, and not that carried on in the East; but, by way of a preface to this paper, I will say a word or two on the latter theme.

Most, if not all, works published in Soviet Russia, and later the U.S.S.R., on the theme of Soviet foreign policy have dealt exclusively with the inter-state level, or intergovernmental level, of international relations, with emphasis upon the importance of peaceful co-existence, détente, increased trade and scientific co-operation. These works have stood in isolation from the mainstream of Party publications on international affairs, which have dealt mainly with the proletarian revolution and the progress of national liberation movements in the Third World, the gamut of socialist internationalism.

This dichotomy is ongoing, but there has recently been a movement within Soviet historiography to unify these two separate and distinctive elements in the study of Soviet foreign policy. In 1972, an analysis of Lenin's foreign policy was published in the U.S.S.R., a turning point in this respect.² The author, Chubaryan, makes explicit the interaction between the international revolutionary aspects of Soviet policy at that time and the pacific diplomatic realm of policy under Lenin. Chubaryan criticises fellow scholars who, at the end of the 1950s and the beginning of the 1960s, "showed a somewhat one-sided approach to the problem of peaceful co-existence." In works of that period, what was commonly lost sight of was "that Lenin examined all events from the point of view of the revolutionary struggle, of the perspective of the world revolutionary process, of the struggle against imperialism, for the liberation of nations."

This is an advance in Soviet historiography, an advance which should allow for greater accuracy in Soviet analyses of their country's foreign relations. To the outsider this may seem small fish: to him it is clear that the study of Soviet foreign policy within the U.S.S.R. is determined in its boundaries by the Central Committee of the CPSU, and that bias is inbuilt where the Soviet academic system is concerned, a by-product of the political structure of the U.S.S.R.

But what of the study of Soviet foreign policy in the West, where the restrictions that confine Soviet scholars in the sense of Party dictates do not apply? Is it not imprisoned in its own padded cell?
