

A Case Study on Empowering Bilingual Writers: Gauging the Gain of Authentic Situated Materials on College Students' Writing Skills

Abstract Writing is a sophisticated socio-cultural activity and is essential for bilinguals to acquire. This case study gauged the gains in linguistic and non-linguistic writing skills among five Arab bilingual college students using authentic situated materials in the United Arab Emirates (UAE). An explanatory mixed-methods design was adopted, starting with a background questionnaire and a diagnostic test to guide the pre- and post-tests and the program design. These tests collected quantitative data following a two-month program implementation while qualitative data included analyses of written documents (sociocultural-situated tasks) and an anxiety self-report scale. Additionally, individual semi-structured interviews provided further insights into the quantitative results. The findings revealed significant improvements in writing, particularly in idea organization, vocabulary, language structure, reduced anxiety, and positive views toward authentic situated materials in bilingual learning. This highlights the need for additional research and improved pedagogical practices that relate to situated sociocultural contexts for bilingual learners.

1. Introduction

Writing is essential for bilinguals to acquire English since it is a sophisticated sociocultural activity (Hassan, 2024). Acquiring writing skills is often seen as a challenging phase in learning a second language, as it necessitates a strong foundational understanding of the target language's functions, usages, and aims. Additionally, developing writing abilities relies on a practical and constructive combination of other skills, such as listening, speaking, and reading (Abramova, 2023; Anwar & Ahmed, 2016; Haley & Austin, 2004). Writing, as a key component of literacy, is more than a mechanical skill—it reflects learners' ability to think critically, express meaning, and participate in academic and social communities through language (Gee, 2001; Kern, 2000). Writing in the English language emphasizes the importance of practicality as a key element. This focus on practicality ensures that communication is clear, efficient, and
