

STUDY SKILLS FOR CRIMINOLOGY

Nerida Chazal & Rhiannon Bandiera

Introduction

Learning and understanding new material – theories, approaches, ideas, and facts – is a large part of studying at university. Another, almost equally important aspect of study is learning how to communicate your ideas in an effective, persuasive and compelling manner. Learning to research, write well and respond to all the requirements of an assignment are crucial skills that a student must master. Yet, too often little time or thought is given to building proficiency in study and writing skills as students, understandably, grapple with complex and challenging new material.

In this chapter we provide you with the information and tools you need to develop your study and writing skills. Because each university and topic is different, we discuss a set of skills that you can apply to many forms assessment, from essays, to exams and reports. We group these skills as:

- understanding assessment and planning work;
- researching effectively;
- thinking critically;
- arguing persuasively; and
- writing clearly.

Throughout the chapter we use an example of a criminological essay question to practically demonstrate these skills to you. Essays are one of the most universal pieces of assessment and most criminology topics will require you to write one. However, the skills we describe are also transferable, so we will explain how they can be applied to different types of assessment¹.

1. Understanding Assessment and Planning Work

Before you begin your assignment it is important to step back and consider the assessment's requirements. Taking time to reflect on the assessment structure or assignment question will help to ensure that you understand what is being asked of you, enabling you to address all of the necessary components of the question or task.

Managing Assignments

¹ We have used mock sources in our in-text examples to demonstrate how to reference. Citations referring to Smith, Jones, Harvey, Clarke and Fells, and the National Crime Office are mock sources. All other sources are real.
