

The Forgotten Story of a Utah Coal Town

Winter Quarters, Utah is now a ghost town locked behind gates in a narrow canyon. More than a century ago, noisy trains filled with coal shared the valley floor with wagons traveling nearby along the narrow dirt road and town buildings. Nearly 1,000 residents lived in homes perched on steep hillside built by miners on company land. The last two crumbling walls of the Washburn House stand as a silent monument to a once thriving mining town, famous for the worst mining disaster in Utah history - the Siltfield mine disaster of May 1, 1900, where 200 men and boys died.

This is a photograph version of the Winter Quarters map produced January 1st, 1901 by the Thomas & Don Canada Western railroad engineering office. The entire first map was published in the Western Mining and Railroad Museum in Ogden, Utah.
