One technique the stars in the world might employ to determine their exact location is to use the stars' own satellites, whose signals they can receive and send. Astronomers already use the signals from satellites to determine the exact location of stars in the sky. But what if the stars could use their own satellites to determine their location? This is the idea behind the concept of a "stellar GPS" system. In this system, stars would use their own satellites to determine their location, and then use this information to determine the location of other stars. This would be a revolutionary advance in astronomy, as it would allow us to determine the location of stars with unprecedented accuracy.
