BUSINESS

Art Nash, an equities analyst at Goldman, Sachs & Co., waits for an early train at the Newport station. On the ride to Grand Central, he goes over research and prepares for the day ahead. His first stop this morning is at midtown hotel where he attends a presentation given by a company he's covering. After the meeting is over, he checks in with his staff. Then he grabs a taxi and heads for the office, where he'll begin writing up a detailed report about the presentation. Nash's job at Goldman, Sachs has three distinct parts. He helps institutional investors make investments in the stock market, he helps corporate clients raise money in capital markets and he works with corporate clients to arrange mergers and acquisitions. Last year, institutional investor magazine picked Nash as the leading major chemical analyst on its annual All-American Research Team.

Calling the shots

By Michael A. Barlow
Business Editor

Buy? Sell? Hold? Most investors rely on experts to tell them where to go in the market—and where to jump out of the market. Michael, Eliot's younger son, called equities analysis. Being, institutional and even more so, world-changing power on Wall Street. Much of his professional value lies in a few days' notice of these decisions.

Others observed in markets, mostly provided by their companies, analysts work at the phone, some between meetings and visits, sending the numbers back to their companies for investors and investors hungry for profits.

Michael's brother, Art Nash, is considered one of the best analysts in the business. He calls himself a "bull." His colleagues call him "Nash."

Most of Nash's recent calls have been in the "bull" of Wall Street's growth. He is not a bull in the rest of the market.

A very bad day

It was back in 1994, on a sweltering day in June, when Michael's of Cypres Industries went bankrupt.

"It was one of the worst days of the year. The 4,000 shares of the company had been the only thing I had in the market. I was losing a lot of money," says Nash, who is in charge of investment research at the Wall Street, NY-based chemical company.

Cypres has several facilities, including one in Maryland.

Nash, who works for the chemical industry for Goldman, Sachs & Co., has been a consultant for investors.

"It's a business where 200 to 300 people manage most of the business," Nash says.

Cypres, which had been spun off by American Cyanamid, the previous year, had not been listed.

"The company's big competitors, the DuPont and the DowChem, are in the same business, so they were a little nervous," Nash says. "They were a little nervous, so they were a little nervous." Nash says, "They were a little nervous, so they were a little nervous."

"They were a little nervous, so they were a little nervous," Nash says. "They were a little nervous, so they were a little nervous."
