Isle of the Undead Lloyd Arthur Eshbach, 2011-05-23 A gripping thrilling uncanny tale about the frightful fate that befell a yachting party on the dreadful island of living dead men Excerpt A drab gray sheet of cloud slipped stealthily from the moon's round face like a shroud slipping from the face of one long dead a coldly phosphorescent face from which the eyes had been plucked Yellow radiance fell toward a calm oily sea seeking a narrow bank of fog lying low on the water penetrating its somber mass like frozen yellow fingers Vilma Bradley shuddered and shrank against Clifford Darrell's brawny form It's it's ghastly Cliff she said Ghastly Darrell leaned against the rail laughing softly One cocktail too many that's the answer It's given you the jitters Listen Faintly from the salon came strains of dance music and the rhythmic shuffle of feet A nifty yacht a South Sea moon a radio dance orchestra dancers and little Clifford And you call it ghastly Almost savagely his arms tightened about her and the bantering note left his voice I'm crazy about you Vilma She tried to laugh but it was an unconvincing sound It's the moon Cliff I guess I never saw it like that before Something's going to happen something dreadful I just know it Oh be sensible Vilma There was a hint of impatience in Cliff's deep voice A gorgeous girl in his arms dark haired dark eyed made for love and she talked of dreadful things which were going to happen because the moon looked screwy She released herself and glanced out over the sea I know I'm silly but Her voice froze and her slender body stiffened Cliff look Darrell spun around and as he stared he felt a dryness seeping into his throat choking him Out of the winding sheet of fog into the moonlight crept a strange strange craft her crumbling timbers blackened and rotted with incredible age The corpse of a ship she seemed resurrected from the grave of the sea Her prow thrust upward like a scimitar bent backward hovering over the gaunt ruin of a cabin whose seaward sides were formed by port and starboard bows From a shallow pit amidships jutted the broken arm of a mast its splintered tip pointing toward the blindly watching moon The stern thickly covered with the moldering encrustations of age curved inward above the strange high poop beneath which lay another cabin And along either side of her worm eaten freeboard ran a row of apertures like oblong portholes Out of these projected great oars long unwieldy as somberly black as the rest of the ancient hulk
