The theoretical and empirical study of grammaticalization is finally making a comeback, after decades of neglect by mainstream theoretical linguistics. In the 19th century and until the beginning of this century, grammaticalization was widely recognized as one of the main mechanisms of language change and as an important explanatory factor in grammatical theory. For linguists such as Humboldt, Bopp (cf. Stolz 1991), Whitney (1875), Bréal (cf. Nerlich 1990), G. von der Gabelentz, Paul, and Meillet, the causes and consequences of grammaticalization were naturally of central concern. The rise of structuralism in the 20th century (first of the Saussurean and Bloomfieldian, later of the Chomskyan kind), with its insistence on the strict separation of langue and parole, and of synchrony and diachrony, led to a steep decline in research and knowledge about grammaticalization.

The two volumes under review (containing papers from a 1988 symposium held at the University of Oregon at Eugene) are not the only sign that a recovery is well under way. Other recent publications (e.g. Axmayer et al. (eds.) 1988, Heine et al. 1991) and on-going research activities show that grammaticalization (or grammaticization) is now a popular topic, at least among functionally oriented grammarians.

The volumes contain an introduction by the editors (printed at the beginning of each volume) and 25 papers (11 in vol. I, 14 in vol. II), as well as detailed indexes. Most papers deal with a rather narrow set of data from an individual language or a small group of languages and consider these data in depth in the light of grammaticalization theory. About 20 papers fall in this category, representing an astonishing variety of languages from five continents:

Oceania:

Talmy Givón (I)	New Guinea languages	serial verbs
Roger M. Keesing (I)	Melanesian Pidgin	substrates, calquing
Frantisek Lichtenberk (I)	To'aba'ita (Oceanic)	verb > prep., conj.

Asia:

Carol Genetti (II)	Newari (Tibeto-Burman)	postp. > subordinator
