Vehicles that are used frequently and for long distances will require more frequent maintenance than those that are used infrequently and for short distances. The frequency of use will also determine the type of maintenance required. For example, a vehicle that is used frequently and for long distances will require more frequent oil changes, tire rotations, and brake inspections than a vehicle that is used infrequently and for short distances. The type of maintenance required will also determine the cost of the maintenance. For example, a vehicle that is used frequently and for long distances will require more expensive maintenance than a vehicle that is used infrequently and for short distances.
