

the world, bringing to other areas the same sense of conservation and economic stimulation the Riverwalk has brought to San Antonio. The river corridor outline details the great impact that the Riverwalk has had on the people and the state of Texas, and it emphasizes that the Riverwalk possesses:

unique national significance because it demonstrates how a river-based, Spanish-designed water system incorporating both natural and man-made features has provided the generating stimulus for development of the urban form.

Also the San Antonio Conservation Society itself has expanded in number and in its goals and has played a pivotal role in the conservation of some of San Antonio's most important and historic sites, including the Alamo, the Spanish Governor's Palace, and the other Spanish missions in the city. Today they are one of the largest, best organized, and most successful historic preservation groups in the nation, living up to their hope to say not, "Yes, I remember it," but, "Here it is, I helped to save it." The women were ahead of their times. In fact one of their greatest successes was in surviving as an "organization being founded and governed solely by women, making it very unique for both those times and for decades after. Their success in preservation, tax incentives, adaptive use of historical sites, are only a few of the accomplishments now used nationally."

The San Antonio River could easily have been rerouted around the city and paved over for use as a parking lot and/or a sewer, but, that did not happen because a group of well-organized, concerned women challenged the established citizens and sentiments in San Antonio. Those women formed the San Antonio Conservation Society and persuaded the city to compromise on a river beautification program as a flood control measure. By joining forces they built an attraction that brings thousands of tourists to San Antonio. Today the Riverwalk is a monument to what civic pride, cooperation and determination can do for a community.
