himself, and there were, of course, the patents that bore Leslie Irvin's own name.

It was actual gains, with patents in hand. The Irvin company held most of the area by the end of the 1920s, and played them with skill: whenever there was a new patent, the Irvin company would play a card that it didn't hold, the patent was called in, in the form of a United States judge. Two patent suits were brought against rival firms by Irvin, at this time.

In 1930 the case of Irvin, versus Russell, was brought before Judge Morris of the United States Court of Delaware. The claim was for infringement of the Floyd Smith patent held by Irvin. Their statements under oath represent the most truthful account of statements during the last thirty years of the century. Judge Morris found in favor of Russell, but the decision was reversed in the appeals court. The Russell Parachute Company eventually went out of business in 1936.

In 1934 when Stanley Smith's company was making some small headway as a potential rival to the Irvin monopoly in America, George Wate kept them in their place through a successful action for infringement of patents pertaining to rigging line storage systems and the ripcord handle - the only two details of the Smith Safety Chute that Floyd Smith had failed to 'design around'.

It is doubtful, however, if the shareholders of the Irvin management, their strong hand of patents, and the skill of their lawyers could alone have retained such a hold on the parachute industry. The proven quality of the product must be considered the primary reason why for twenty years the Irvin 'chute' was virtually unrivalled. Had any other company been able to point to deficiencies in the Irvin safety record, or had any of the same services had reason to doubt the reliability of the equipment, the story would have been different. The story would then have been
