Economy Thomas M. Stanback,2002 The twenty first century has been marked by the decline of goods producing sectors as providers of jobs in the US economy and by the continuous rise in importance of most service sectors This shift toward services has touched every city town and hamlet in the country Yet the impact of this transformation on employment earnings and income has varied widely among places affecting their chances for prosperity and a favorable employment environment in the years ahead By focusing on the metropolitan area rather than only the central city Thomas M Stanback points out that suburbs have become more than neighborhood markets or sources of commuter labor for the central city Rather suburb and central city are closely and symbiotically related economically and to a significant degree culturally as well Thomas M Stanback in this work analyzes the major transformations affecting 319 metropolitan areas across the US during the last three decades of the twentieth century This comprehensive analysis documents five significant trends the pervasiveness of the new service economy the dominance of metropolitan economies the growing economic specialization separating metro areas the wide ranging differences in employment earnings and income growth across metro areas and the increasing importance of non earned income as a source of aggregate demand Stanback classifies US metro areas by industry and examines which economic sectors produced the fastest growth in income and employment This concise thorough and clearly written volume is essential background reading for students practitioners and public officials concerned with national regional and local economic growth and economic development Routledge Handbook of Southeast Asian
