THE AGE OF THE ACADEMIES

Edited by Theodore R.Sizer

Classics in Education

(New York, Bureau of Publications, Teachers College, Columbia University. 1964.)

This collection of sources of the history of eighteenth and nineteenth-century academies in America is another in a useful series issued under the auspices of Teachers College, Columbia University. It offers a variety of selections from educational documents, including an essay by John Milton; Benjamin Franklin's Proposals Relating to the Education of Youth in Pennsylvania; the 1836 circular of the Albany Female Academy; and several examples of regulations covering the behavior of teachers and students. These documents and the others were chosen for what they reveal about the foundation of academies, their supporters and critics, the life led within their walls, and their altered role at the end of the nineteenth century. As suggestive as they are, the documents cannot provide the basis for a full history of the development of academies. But they do suggest points of departure for a student interested in certain aspects of the academy.

The development of the academy is ably handled in an introduction by Mr. Sizer. He places the origin of the academies in a context of republican educational thought and accounts for their demise a century later largely in terms of urbanization. The academy, he argues, was an institution appropriated in rural America; it became obsolete as population increased in the cities and as new educational institutions arose to meet needs uniquely urban. Mr. Sizer's treatment of the colonial period is less persuasive. He relays the familiar myth of rural educational poverty in New England and seems unaware that town and parish schools provided much more education than the district schools. He also overemphasizes the academy's uniqueness as an institution.

Yet, all in all, his introduction is a good piece of work; and this volume is excellent.
