

Werner F. Leopold, Speech Development of a Bilingual Child, Vol. II: Sound-learning in the First Two Years. Northwestern University "Studies in the Humanities," No. 11, 1947. Pp. xii, 296.

Leopold is one of a comparatively small number of trained linguists who have applied scientific method to the study of child speech, a province largely dominated heretofore by well-meaning amateurs or, what is more regrettable, contemned by scholars. He is well acquainted with his predecessors in the field and is in close touch with contemporary authorities (see e.g., his article "Study of Child Language and Infant Bilingualism" in Word, IV [1948], 1-17).

In the present work, the second of four contemplated volumes, sound-learning in the first two years is the object of analysis. In the first section (pp. 1-85) Leopold gives the representation of standard sounds in the child's speech. By "standard sounds" he means the sounds of the "colloquial speech of educated speakers using an informal, unaffected pronunciation," which is, perhaps, a slightly subjective definition. The languages involved are English (Midwestern American) and German. The child is the author's daughter, Hildegard. Her speech is compared from time to time with that of her younger sister, Karla. There is no clear demarcation between English and German in this phase of the study, the two being discussed frequently in the same paragraph. This practice has both defects and merits. It results in some confusion by conveying the impression that the child speaks one language equal to the sum of two. But it has the advantage of demonstrating the constant action of each language upon the other almost every step of the way. The present reviewer, who has studied sporadically the speech of bilingual and polylingual children (but with nothing approaching the thoroughness of Leopold), is somewhat surprised at the amount of phonetic interaction which Leopold found between the two languages. In the reviewer's experience the substitution of the sounds of one language by those of another is relatively rare in the speech of polylingual children.
