Thus, condition (92) is not contradictory to the results of the self-propulsion test.

5. CONCLUSION

From the theoretical and experimental studies for the interaction of the hull and propeller, the following conclusions are derived:

- (i) Flow field in the vicinity of a hull is analyzed by using acceleration potential, and the approximate calculation method is derived. This method can be used to calculate the change of pressure on the hull and has a higher practical applicability than conventional methods.

- (ii) For the analysis of the wake at a distant position behind a ship Oseen's approximation is used, and the optimum condition is given for the wake energy recovery by the propeller. This condition is examined by the results of the self-propulsion tests and the wake survey measurements.
