

Written Texts and Cultural Readings

Janet Swaffar

University of Texas at Austin

---

The thesis of this paper is a simple one: cultural differences must be discovered as dialogic practices, not learned as monologic features. Cultural differences are found in mutually defining networks of practices, not inventories of practices: in patterns of behavior, not in behaviors as such. The most consistent cultural networks are located in authentic texts for listening, viewing, or reading. One working definition of authentic materials is that they were originally produced by native speakers to be read by native speakers. As artifacts of the second language's culture, such texts present the second language learner with social functions familiar in many, perhaps all, cultures. Yet at the same time they depict concrete situations that are culture specific. In other words, authentic texts offer readers case studies of fundamental human relationships, needs, and social institutions such as kinship, ritual behavior, social status, governance, or eating arrangements as they are manifested in the unfamiliar culture.*

CULTURAL MISREADINGS AND L2 COMPREHENSION

To illustrate, a marriage ritual is common to most cultures. Even where formal ceremonies seem quite similar, however, the broader significance of what is happening—its social meaning—may diverge radically from one culture to the next. Steffensen and her colleagues (1979) did a now classic study a decade ago with students from America and India. Descriptions of American and Indian weddings were read by both groups. Although the two texts were in English, recall was consistently higher for the text from each group's own culture—its C1. Differences were qualitative as well as quantitative. Consistently, connotations diverged with
