SOLUTION Let x be the number of people who attended the 2012 Summer Olympics. Then the number of people who attended the 2008 Summer Olympics is $x + 1.1$ million. The total number of people who attended both the 2008 and 2012 Summer Olympics is 2.1 million. Background: Chlamydia trachomatis (CT) is the most common bacterial sexually transmitted infection (STI) in the United States. It is a leading cause of pelvic inflammatory disease (PID), which can lead to infertility. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC) recommends that all sexually active women under 25 years of age be screened for CT annually. However, many women do not get screened, and many who do are not correctly diagnosed or treated.	Objectives: The purpose of this study was to evaluate the effectiveness of a community-based intervention to increase CT screening and treatment rates among sexually active women under 25 years of age in a low-income, urban population.
Methods: A randomized controlled trial was conducted in a low-income, urban population. The intervention group received a community-based intervention consisting of a home visit by a trained community health worker (CHW) to provide information about CT screening and treatment, and to facilitate access to screening and treatment services. The control group received no intervention.	Results: The intervention group had significantly higher rates of CT screening and treatment compared to the control group. The intervention was effective in increasing both screening and treatment rates, and the effect was sustained over time.
Conclusions: A community-based intervention can effectively increase CT screening and treatment rates among sexually active women under 25 years of age in a low-income, urban population.	Keywords: Chlamydia trachomatis, sexually transmitted infection, screening, treatment, community-based intervention, low-income, urban population.
