

An imaginary museum quarter: towards cultural and urban renewal

Nina Ugljen-Ademović and Senka Ibrišimbegović

"Above all, architecture is resistance against the system, against physical globalisation that does not respect the genius loci, the spirit of places, the context, the differences between people..."

Jean Nouvel¹

Introduction

The contemporary urban transformations we are witnessing show a considerable degree of diversity conditioned, among other things, by perceptions and attitudes towards the development of cultural identity and culture in general. Constant, turbulent, global changes are accelerating the pace of life, often at odds with our ability to adapt and follow them.

The pandemic has been an additional global preoccupation, lasting for more than two years, highlighting all the shortcomings of urban development taking place in the absence of specific, professionally-driven planning. The issue of the lack of public spaces within the urban environment, which is now even more at risk and profoundly changing, has also surfaced.

We are thus obliged today to evaluate our previous approaches and think about the future of space from these new positions, not only considering the technological challenges but also the various unpredictable situations that are becoming a reality.
