MILLENNIUM DEVELOPMENT GOALS IN SUB-SAHARA AFRICA: A CRITICAL ASSESSMENT

Ogunrotifa Ayodeji Bayo

University of Edinburgh, UK

INTRODUCTION

A critical look at the African continent in the twenty-first century overwhelmingly produces a picture of a failed attempt at development. The underdevelopment reality reflects the pervasive conditions of misery, disease, economic stagnation, poverty and other forms of negativities that have plagued Africa continent over decades. In both power and historical terms, most countries in the continent of Africa are basically 'new' in the contemporary global society, following the auspicious wind of decolonization that swept through the international system from the 1960s. However, the euphoria which followed the end of colonial rule in the African continent, fizzled into thin air, as the fortunes of African countries have dishearteningly declined, more than four decades after the end of colonial rule. The ugly trends of failure and gross under-development of Africa (economically, socially and politically), refute the quaint Hegelian notion that history always moves forward such that in Africa it has been running in the reverse for more than two decades.
