

Soviet-American Science Accord: Could Dissent Deter Détente?

Through the years of the Cold War, American and Soviet scientists have managed to maintain relatively amicable relations amid the variable hostility of the two superpowers. Contacts were sustained through international scientific organizations and meetings, Pugwash conferences, limited but durable official exchange programs, and through a variety of improvised personal efforts. Now, at a time when Soviet and American governments seem genuinely committed to major expansion of cooperation between the two scientific communities (see story below), some American scientists are viewing the prospect in a critical spirit, and a few are even raising the question of their willingness to cooperate.

Two main issues are involved. The first is the Soviet government's policy on the emigration of Soviet Jews to Israel. The problem has a special dimension for Jewish scientists and other professionals, since Soviet authorities have applied special sanctions against them, most notably an "education tax," levied, as the explanation goes, to compensate the state for the cost of the training of members of the elite.

The second issue is the more general one of "scientific freedom." For years, Western scientists have been aware of official controls on the activities of Soviet scientists—for example, on freedom to travel outside the Soviet Union to attend international meetings, to receive foreign visitors in their laboratories, to exchange research results, and even to conduct personal correspondence with foreign colleagues. In broad terms, American and western European scientists are arguing for international acceptance of the principle that a scientist should have the right to pursue his work to the limits of his abilities where he chooses.

To some degree, the scientific-freedom issue intersects the "human rights" issue raised in the Soviet Union by a relatively small group of dissenters who concern themselves primarily with civil liberties. Several prominent scientists, writers, and artists have been identified with this "movement." Physicist Andrei

U.S.-U.S.S.R. Agreement on Cooperation in Science, Technology

American and Soviet negotiators on 21 March announced 25 "action programs" designed to give substance to the agreement on cooperation in fields of science and technology signed during President Nixon's visit to Moscow last May.

The science and technology protocol—or "S and T" agreement as it is called for convenience—is one of four new agreements for cooperation in scientific and technical fields unveiled in Moscow. The other three accords were in medical science and public health, space, and environmental protection. The new agreements are regarded as falling within the general rubric of the American-Soviet agreement on exchanges and cooperation in scientific and cultural fields established in the 1950's. Scientific exchanges have been administered by the National Academy of Sciences on the American side, but under the new agreements a variety of agencies, including the National Science Foundation (NSF), will participate directly. Work in each of the four new areas is being coordinated by a "joint commission" composed of high-level Soviet and American government officials and scientists, but specific projects are being developed by working groups of specialists from government, universities, and industry in the two countries.

Implementation of the agreement on science and technology is somewhat less advanced than on the other protocols. In the environment, health, and space areas, considerably more spacework had been done before the Moscow talks. Meetings on the S and T agreement were delayed by the illness of V. A. Kirillin, chairman of the Soviet State Committee for Science and Technology and Soviet chairman of the joint commission on scientific and technical cooperation. For the Americans, Edward E. David, Jr., first U.S. chairman of the Joint commission, was replaced by NSF director H. Guyford Stever, after David resigned as the President's science adviser in January.

Estimates of the costs of participation in the cooperative efforts have not yet been made public, and there has been speculation as to whether the Nixon Administration, in a time of budget stringency, would be willing to put large sums into new programs.

So far, the only major undertaking in progress is the development of compatible rendezvous and docking systems for manned Soviet and American spacecraft and space stations. The necessary funds have been approved by the Office of Management and Budget for the coming fiscal year, and design of the hardware is said to be well along. A team of about 40 Soviet scientists, engineers, and cosmonauts was in Houston during the last half of March working on the project.

It is axiomatic that projects involving development of hardware systems are expensive, and no such big projects in other areas are said to be even in the talking stage.

In general, federal agencies have been told they will have to finance their activities under the cooperative program out of available funds. So far, costs have been confined primarily to paying for exchange visits by working parties and small groups of scientists, and the expense has been manageable. Observers say that there are signs that the Soviets may have budget problems of their own and that the terms have made agencies on both sides limit projects to those they really want to do.

Much of the activity planned so far amounts to ex-
