

The Energy Sector and Energy Policy in the Soviet Economy

Before proceeding to our main subject—the examination of Soviet energy technology and its use in efforts to build up Soviet industry in general and the energy sector in particular—we must first examine the Soviet Union's energy resources and the major lines of energy policy in the postwar years. This chapter discusses the Soviet energy resources base, some distinctive features of the structure of the supply and demand for energy in the Soviet economy, and the establishment of the overall framework of energy policy. The final section summarizes the energy sector's importance in a socialist or planned economic structure.

ENERGY RESOURCES

The nature of the Soviet energy resources base has important consequences for Soviet energy policy and for the direction of its efforts in energy R and D. The Soviet Union's energy resources are large enough that it can permit the trade questions that so many nations are plagued with as well as have much to export. But as one of these nations we expect to be the only large industrial country in that position. But the economic characteristics of its energy resources are not especially attractive, and most of its internal energy demands and the direction of its energy R and D are conditioned by the demands, quality, transportability, and other economic features of these energy resources. The best way to examine the situation is to describe briefly the major components of the energy resources base.

Coal*

Soviet authorities like us very much the USSR has more built the coal resources of the world. This is based on their estimates of 4,000 billion tons of "general-geological" reserves, divided into 1,000 billion tons of proven or Soviet-type reserves (100 billion tons of coal and 900 billion tons of lignite). More important than reserves for planning are the reserves kept by the All-Union Geological Fund of unexplored and uncommercially pro-

*The following discussion is based mostly on statistics given by the Soviet Union.

†The above is correct in the USSR, comparison of the Soviet reserves is made here. The definition of these categories is rather detailed, but the changes in the need to describe reserves sufficiently well required to justify production decisions.
