

The torch of the statue was not put over. A few months later, on Liberty Island in New York's harbor, was the statue's home. In fact, the Americans had to raise enough money to build the statue with high pedestal.

Joseph P. Moir, publisher of the New York World, asked people to help—and help they did. Schoolchildren, laborers, sea captains, people from all over the United States sent in their pennies, nickels, dimes, and dollars. By August of 1883, more than 224,000 people had contributed the $200,000 needed to finish the pedestal, but the work was not completed until April of 1886.

At last the pieces of the statue were uncrated and put together. The construction took two months. More than 200,000 rivets were needed to fasten the copper skin to the iron skeleton. Craftsmen attached the steel aerial platforms, riveting the statue in place while New Yorkers gaped in amazement.

The sculptor, Bartholdi, came to New York to see his beloved creation settled in its appointed place. When he arrived, the fog in the harbor was so thick that he couldn't even see the base of the statue. But the fog cleared up in time for him to get a dazzling view of his masterpiece.
