Trocadero, unless they happen to be civil engineers, which, of course, most of them are not, are in the habit of taking the passing of railroads through mountain ranges entirely for granted. As the train advances, the apparently impenetrable mass which blocked the sky has conveniently moved and "amalgams itself" to accommodate an almost level roadbed. Trains do not climb hills, it will be noticed, and yet with only an occasional, hardly perceptible, grade, an occasional tunnel or switchback, sometimes with no tunnel at all, the ascent and descent are accomplished and the mountain moved. This, I repeat, the layman takes quite as a matter of course. Unless its attention is especially drawn to them, mountain passes are the very last thing with which it concerns itself.

And yet, particularly in the western part of America where railroads followed so comparatively soon upon the first appearance of white man in a barbaric sense—the surveys being made before the general topography of the country was known or the savage inhabitants subdued—each pass has a story of historic as well as of technical interest.

This is especially true of Marias Pass through the Rocky Mountains on the southern boundary of Glacier National Park. Its whole story cannot be told. History in this particular part of the United States does not begin with recent times, while this broad national highway across the Continental Divide witnessed many famous scenes of human activity in remote periods of prehistoric habitation.

A Railroad to the Pacific

About the middle of the last century Congress, responding to a long expressed popular demand, and the pressure of economic development in the West, took the first definite measure toward the building of a transcontinental railroad. In 1858 an appropriation was made for "explorations and surveys to ascertain the most practicable and economical route for a railroad from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean." The forces were to be organized in as many distinct corps as there are routes to be surveyed.

During the ten or fifteen years preceding this Congressional action, the demands for such a road had been inspired quite as much by a flowery but sincere hyperbolicism as by the commercial advantage that would accrue. It was widely felt that a railroad would be an important factor in making and keeping the territories West, Southwest and Northwest of the Louisiana purchase—Texas, California and Oregon—a part of the United States. That they became a part of the Union before the construction of the railroad only made the need for it the more imperative.

Unfortunately by 1850, politics had entered into and perverted the springs of an earlier, largely patriotic, Everybody wanted a road, but the South did not want the North to have it and the North wished to enjoy itself the privilege and material expansion it would bring.

Five highways of travel were known and in use across the continent. Three routes, as Edwin L. Reagin points out in "Building the Pacific Railway," were popularly referred to as the Northern trail, from the headquarters of the Mississippi to Puget Sound by way of passes in the vicinity of Montana and Butte; the Mormon trail from Council Bluffs to California and Oregon by way of the South Pass and Salt Lake City; the Mormon "Hollers" trail from Westport (now Kansas City) to San Francisco by way of the southern Colorado Rockies; the route of the 32nd parallel from Fort Scott, Arkansas to San Pedro (Los Angeles) and the Southern trail from the Red River across Texas and Arizona to San Pedro.

Three wells had been found by the early fur traders, used and to some extent changed and improved by the stream of adventurers hitherby that subsequently flowed in small but increasing volume across the wilderness to the gold fields of California and Montana and the rich agricultural lands of the Oregon country.

Isaac L. Stevens

The Congress in 1850, besides authorizing the Pacific railroad survey created the new territory of Washington out of that portion of the Oregon country north of the Columbia River and 49th parallel to the international boundary and west from the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific.

Almost immediately Major Isaac L. Stevens, of the engineering corps of the United States Army, applied both for the position of territorial governor and for the leadership of that corps of the railway survey which was to explore the Northern route. He thrust ahead in making this enterprising request that he asked for these positions not for a reward for political services, but because he was the fittest man for the place, the one who could best serve the public interest—a force of engaging self-confidence characteristic of Isaac Stevens and amply justified by events. The administration seems to have shared his belief in himself as he was promptly given both appointments.

Stevens came from a race of sturdy New England Puritans. He was born in Andover, Massachusetts, in 1815, was an honor graduate of Phillips' Andover Academy and of West Point, was distinguished in the Mexican War, took an active and important part in the reorganization of the Army and rem-
