Abstract

Emotional words differ in how they acquire their emotional charge. There is a relevant distinction between emotion-label words (those that directly name an emotion, e.g., “joy” or “sadness”) and emotion-laden words (those that do not name an emotion, but can provoke it, e.g., “party” or “death”). In this work, we focused on emotion-label words. These words vary in their emotional prototypicality, which indicates the extent to which the word refers to an emotion. We conducted two lexical decision experiments to examine the role played by emotional prototypicality in the recognition of emotion-label words. The results showed that emotional prototypicality has a facilitative effect in word recognition. Emotional prototypicality would ease conceptual access, thus facilitating the retrieval of emotional content during word recognition. In addition to the theoretical implications, the evidence gathered in this study also highlights the need to consider emotional prototypicality in the selection of emotion-label words in future studies.

Introduction

The interplay between cognition and emotion has been intensively studied in recent decades. This topic has been examined in a variety of cognitive domains, including language, in general, and word recognition, in particular. Most studies in the field have compared the processing of affective (emotional) and non-affective (neutral) words. A lot of the research has relied on emotional valence and emotional arousal to characterize emotional words, as many authors have found that these dimensions are the most relevant for describing the human affective space (e.g., Bradley & Lang, 1999). Emotional valence refers to the affective value of a word, which can range from very negative/aversive to very positive/appealing. For instance, the word “gun” is a negatively valenced word (i.e., a negative word), whereas the word “friendship” is a positively valenced one (i.e., a positive word). Emotional arousal, on the other hand, indicates the degree of activation associated with a word, from very calming/relaxing to very activating/exciting. For instance, the word “boredom” has a low arousal while “explosion” has a high arousal. There is substantial evidence, mostly obtained from lexical decision task (LDT) studies, that both valence and arousal influence word recognition (e.g., Kousta et al., 2009; Kuperman et al., 2014; Rodríguez-Ferreiro & Davies, 2018; see also Hinojosa et al., 2020, for a review), with positive (e.g., Vinson et al., 2014) and highly arousing words (e.g., Vieitez et al., 2021) being recognized faster than neutral and low arousing words. These effects have been shown to be modulated by several lexico-semantic variables, such as lexical frequency (e.g., Méndez-Bertolo et al., 2011; Palazova et al., 2011; Scott et al., 2009) and concreteness (e.g., Palazova et al., 2013; Pomari et al., 2018).

A variable that may be relevant in this field of research is the relationship between the emotional word and the emotion it conveys (e.g., Altarriba, 2006; Pavlenko, 2008). Not all emotional words acquire their affective charge in the same way. Some of them, the so-called emotion-label words (EM henceforth), name an emotion directly. This category includes words like “joy”, “anger” and “sadness”,
