

Strained Mercy: The Economics of Canadian Health Care*, Robert G. Evans. Toronto: Butterworth, 1984, 390 pp.

Reviewer: David Feeny, Ph.D., Departments of Economics and Clinical Epidemiology and Biostatistics, McMaster University, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada.

Robert Evans has written a lively, articulate, and insightful analysis of the Canadian health care system and its evolution, which, although published five years ago, remains the major synthesis of research on health care in Canada. Evans' blend of the analytical approaches of health economics with relevant empirical evidence from Canada, United States, United Kingdom, and Europe continues to offer timely insights that warrant review.

Evans begins with extensions to standard microeconomic models that take into account important characteristics of health care services. Uncertainties about the incidence of disease motivate a discussion on the economics of uncertainty and insurance. Adverse selection, moral hazard, and the transaction cost of providing insurance are examined, and the evolution of institutional arrangements to address these problems is discussed. Evans' explicit linking of the theory of market failure, empirical evidence, and choice of institutional arrangements is a rare and valuable contribution.

Externalities as another important source of market failure are also explored. Standard topics such as positive externalities, in the form of the reduction in the spread of communicable diseases, and negative externalities, associated with the induction of resistance to antibiotics, are discussed. The treatment also includes altruistic externalities and merit-good paternalistic interpersonal relationships that help shape health care policy.

A major focus of Evans' analysis is the importance and implications of asymmetries of information between health care providers and the consumers of health care services. He therefore analyzes the lack of independence between the supply of and demand for services in health care markets. Evans' evidence supports the hypothesis that physicians have considerable discretion in affecting the nature and level of the utilization of health care services. Additional implications of the asymmetries of information are suggested by analyzing professional ethics and socialization, the inculcation of principal-agent relationships, and requirements for professional licensure.

Evans devotes considerable attention to the behavior of various suppliers of inputs (medical equipment, drugs) and suppliers of health-care services (professionals, hospitals, nursing homes) toward the health care sector. While standard analyses assume profit- (or utility-) maximizing behavior, Evans demonstrates why the health care market requires a broader analysis — one that includes non-profit (charitable and religious organizations) and not-only-for-profit (professional practice) firms.

Various models for the behavior of hospitals are presented, and the effects of different systems of payment are explored. Empirical evidence from cost function, specific program, and population utilization studies are discussed.

The behavior of the drug industry toward both innovation and marketing is examined. This analysis is integrated with theories of imperfect competition and the economics of investment in research and development.

Evans introduces basic approaches to program evaluation, including cost-effec-
