

Knapp, in his reflections on the jurisprudence of the International Court of Justice in matters of nationality, concentrates in particular on the Nottebohm case. While he agrees with the Court on the necessity of a bond between state and citizen, he is concerned about the consequences of the decision on the law of citizenship. It is not clear, however, whether he took sufficiently into account that the Court ruled against Liechtenstein's right of diplomatic protection only with regard to Guatemala.

Vol. XVIII starts with an interesting historical study by Professor Paul Guggenheim on general international law and European public law. He traces the development of the universalistic and of the European-Christian concept of international law, and draws a parallel between the non-organizational character of the former and the organizational expression of the Res Publica Christiana and the Droit Public Européen. He sees in the present European integration efforts a new European public law which differs both from the international and national legal orders. Finally, Professor Rudolf Bindschedler contributes succinct comments on the Vienna Conference and Convention on Diplomatic Relations of 1961.

The documentary parts again contain valuable reports on Swiss practice in international law in 1959 and 1960 by Professor Guggenheim, repertories of the treaties concluded by Switzerland which entered into force in 1960 and 1961, by Dr. Emanuel Diez, and bibliographical notes (1959-1961) by Professor Henri Thévenaz. In addition, Vol. XVIII gives the full text of the Flegenheimer decision of 1958¹ and of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations with Protocols of Signature.

The General Index covering the first fifteen volumes of the Yearbook shows the wide variety of the subjects dealt with therein and should prove very useful.

This study was prepared by a team organized under the auspices of the Netherlands Economic Institute Division of Balanced International Growth, headed by Professor Tinbergen, the eminent Dutch economist. The Twentieth Century Fund sponsored the work "out of a desire on the part of the Fund to further serious and objective thinking on the problems of the international economy." For the economist and the technician of international development, there are a number of appendices which are valuable in themselves. They range from a study of economic development and co-operation in Africa, the Middle East, Southeast Asia and Latin America to an analysis of world trade flows.

For the student of international relations and legal organization, Professor Tinbergen's views on the international aspects and problems of
