

these are "age-old beliefs of anonymous ordinary folk" (p. 288) and "a natural and institutional festival of early origin" (p. 338). By the last chapter, Boodé refers to "institutional" and "natural" observances (pp. 390-391). (His use of quotation marks apparently indicates that he is aware that "natural," by which I think he means popular, observances can be institutionalized.) Neither the developmental theme suggested in the quotation nor the idea behind the dichotomies of the pûn-sê figures prominently as an analytical theme in the volume.

Boodé's volume, taken in conjunction with the religious developments of the Former Han, suggests the following: throughout the two hundred years of Former Han, and in spite of the rise of Confucianism, the new empire—existing well-developed models for the ceremonial and religious aspects of empire—fumbled along, making changes but without a clear aim in view. Only with the full elaboration of New Text Confucianism towards the end of Former Han could scholars create "artificial" rituals, ceremonies, and observances that fit both the empire and the new refined ideology. This interpretation, not developed by Boodé, raises several questions: Was New Text Confucianism "artificial", if so, what were the social, political, intellectual, and other consequences of that artificiality? Was the artificiality of New Text ritual in some way responsible for the rise of Old Text Confucianism? Is "artificial" a meaningful term in this context? Does the character of the observances (and closely related, the substance of New Text Confucianism) have anything to do with the rise of Buddhism? Or imperial worship of Le and Li?

I realize that reviewers are not supposed to fault authors for not doing what they did not intend to do. But when the author himself is not clear about what he is trying to do, and when his press does not demand that he present a cohesive argument that will unify the work and give significance to its contents, then the reviewer has an obligation to inform his readers of what they can expect. Boodé did not raise broad interpretive questions; most of the questions that are formulated grow directly out of the severely limited contents of the "Treatise on Ritual." The author was bound by the nature of his text, thereby denying himself the freedom to pursue questions of major significance in Han history.

University of Washington

The Life and Thought of Yeh Shih, by WANG SHOU WEN. Hong Kong: The Chinese University of Hong Kong and the University Press of Florida, 1974. 206 pp. Index. Cloth, $10.00.

The Tang-Sung transition was only pregnant with modernity, says Lo; its progress was retarded by intellectual crisis and it finally aborted in the Mongol debacle of the fourteenth century. Taking up the mind of a Southern Sung scholar-statesman, the author chooses to emphasize the role of state orthodoxy in the decline, a moralism, refined beyond practical relevance, an ideology bureaucratized beyond effort or response. However, "as there is no logical reason why this imperial Confucianism should always be a conservative or inhibiting force," it is not irreparable that Neo-Confucianism could have evolved in such a manner as to embrace and sustain the process of change and development that was transforming China from a medieval society to one producing many springs of social vitality. The author is at this time of reasoning is worth pursuing. (pp. 4-5)

That is an awesome burden with which to begin a book. A might-have-been historiography is unlikely to succeed, anyway, and the ambiguities of Yeh Shih's own mind fairly obliterated the articulation of compelling alternatives. He becomes a foil against which to review the institutional context of Southern Sung Neo-Confucianism.

Lo employs an interesting conceptualization of the transition from Northern to Southern Sung into formal styles. The retreat from activism to moralism, from genius to erudition had already been accomplished in the late reform regimes, exhausted by factional struggles and the trauma of the Jürchen invasions. The Shao-shung canonization of Wang An-shih suppressed both his political imagination and historical criticism, to peddle a benign moralism based on the charming Chün-hua etymologies. Thus the rapid dominance of the Northern Sung metaphysics in Southern Sung intellectual life was not so much a wrenching change of substance as a switch of content within a style already accepted. Ch'eng Yi became the paragon of the new scholarship under Chu Hsi's advocacy because his militancy contained both nominalist and anti-establishment bias, because he gave the new metaphysics a firm and conservative classical foundation, and because his teaching style (the yü-ku 窮理) offered a nonlecturing pedagogy intended to be institutionalized only in the disciple's own self-cultivation.
