

How far did the Liberals create a Welfare State between 1906 and 1911?

A welfare state is where everyone is looked after from Cradle to Grave within a society through provisions by the state. Though the Liberals passed legislation for children, the old and the working class which were starting blocks towards the Welfare state we live in nowadays they did not do enough during the period 1906 to 1911 to be considered a Welfare state as everyone was not looked after from cradle to grave instead only a minority due to legislation being permissive or excluding a large percentage of the population.

The Liberals passed bills to protect and aid children in school and society. The Free School Meals Act of 1906, where the government provide free meals to children most in need. This helped solve the major issue of malnutrition and gave children an equal opportunity in schools. This replaced the minimal charity help which were the only means to help malnourished children before this Act. This was due to the government seeing the severe malnutrition throughout the population due to volunteers in the Boer War being sent away for being thin chested and short stunted. The liberals also passed School Medical Inspections act of 1907 which provided regular medical checks for students by local authorities. Finally, the Liberals passed the Children and Young Persons Act of 1908 which meant parents could be prosecuted for neglect, juvenile courts were set up and children were raised to a protected status. These Acts were passed for all children universally and improved their standard of living to the point government were looking after them throughout their school years
