The Celestine Poet:

The Celestine Poet Martin J. Irwin, 2002 Weightless Words ALFRED. CELESTINE, 2025-09 Alfred Celestine died in London in 2009 at the age of 60 His work found only occasional publication during his lifetime and always from small presses This volume seeks to redress the balance and demonstrate the range of his work using approximately a third of his total output to do so As Jeremy Hilton said in a memorial feature in Fire magazine when I heard Celestine read in London in 2007 I knew I was in the presence of a major but little recognised and little published poet What struck me about him was a combination of his powerful use of language the depth of emotion underlying the linguistic strictness and his drawing on history his own personal struggles and the way these interweaved with the struggle of black people as a nation to find their roots and their contemporary forms of expression All this powerful stuff was in Al Celestine's work finding expression through a continuation of the modernist mode what I most want to say about Al Celestine is that he was one of a number of fine poets scattered around London who wrote calm quotidian intensely personal poetry that was also thereby political And that like a number of other poets he was unjustly little read and yet had the guts and the courage as well as the sufficiency of what it is to be a poet to write on and on through thick and thin He was a very good poet Stephen Watts I love the way Alfred Celestine's poetry works its strange music and its emotional power ere's a lot of history in it a lot of literary allusions and a lot of his personal life It is deeply sensuous and muscular too Christopher Gutkind the moon scythes in and out of Alfred Celestine's poetry sometimes reflecting sometimes black is still not an achievement the word belittles it It's real Keith Jebb *The classic collection of Constance Fenimore Woolson.
