Making the Change from Graded Structure to Flexible Nongraded Program

The first chapter of the book will be devoted to the changing attitudes toward nongraded school organization. We will describe the essential factors involved and relate them directly to the administration, the school, the program, the staff, the children, and the public. We cannot overstate the significance of these steps; they are all important for changing from the traditional elementary school to the nongraded program.

Change in education is as inevitable as change in other areas of the psychological, social, physical, or economic existence of people. Therefore, it is "school people"—those who operate the schools, the board of education, the administrators, the teaching staff, and auxiliary personnel who cooperatively must shape the change. Planning change and changing the environment is the only possible way in which any school person may expect to be effective in his work. Educators who are not planning change for the best possible
