

THE CAUSES OF THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION

Transport & Technology

There was great progress in the development of new machines and new forms of transport. Canals and railways were built across Britain and linked factories and mills with ports, coal mines and towns. Steam trains and canal boats were used to transport goods and raw materials as well as people. Travel became quicker and cheaper. New technology led to the building of quicker and bigger machines which could be powered by steam and run 24 hours a day. By 1800, one person could operate several factory machines and produce 3600 times more cloth than a person working at home could have done back in 1700!

Agriculture & Farming

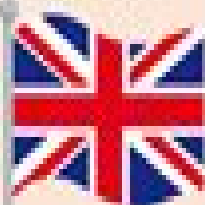

The growing population all needed feeding. There had been inventions such as the 'seed drill' which allowed farmers to plant seeds for their crops quickly in a straight line and then cover them back over with soil. This helped farmers to produce more food. Improved farming methods led to the soil becoming better for growing crops. New ideas about how to breed animals led to more and better-quality meat. Overall, the quality and quantity of food improved to feed the growing population.

The British Empire

Britain built up its vast empire. These were countries around the world that the British had conquered, and the government took over. By the late 1800s, Britain ruled over 54 other countries - these were Britain's colonies. Britain controlled countries such as Canada, India and Australia. Britain could easily bring in raw materials from other countries such as cotton which could be turned into cloth.

Britain's colonies wanted to buy goods made in Britain such as iron, steel, pottery and cloth. Britain also made a fortune from the slave trade. African people were taken as slaves to work in the Caribbean producing resources such as sugar and cotton - all products which could be sold back in Britain.

Peacetime

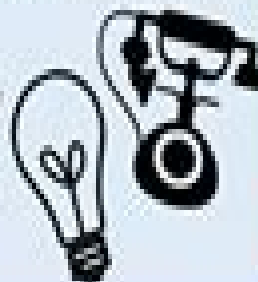

Compared to other countries across Europe, the 1700s and 1800s were a time of peace for Britain. Britain was not directly involved in any major conflicts. In fact, the British army were more busy conquering land across America, Africa and India to become part of the empire.

Inventors

Some of the world's greatest inventors lived in Britain. They created wonderful machines that did things faster and more efficiently than ever before. Steam engines and steam trains were developed with the help of James Watt and Richard Trevithick. Isambard Kingdom Brunel was a world leading engineer and developed building techniques for bridges and railways. George Stephenson created his own steam powered train in 1814.

Thomas Edison invented the lightbulb and Alexander Bell the telephone. Britain's world class education system encouraged inventors like these men and entrepreneurs were more than willing to invest in their inventions to make money.

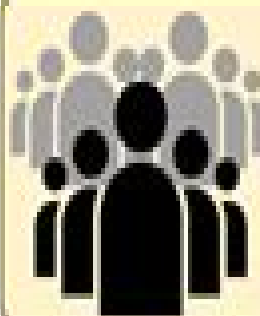

Raw Materials

Britain was rich in some of the world's most valuable raw materials and fossil fuels of the time. By 1850, Britain produced two thirds of the world's coal, half of the world's iron, over half of the world's copper and tin (mainly from Cornwall) and half of the world's cotton cloth. No wonder Britain was called the 'Workshop of the World'. These materials could be used to power and build new factories or sold abroad for a huge amount of money.

Population Growth

In 1750, there was roughly 10 million people in Britain. By 1900 there was over 40 million. With a much better understanding of science, medicine and healthcare, children were becoming healthier and in general, parents wanted more children. A bigger population meant that there was a demand for lots of different goods. People needed clothes, shoes, plates, clocks, tables... the list goes on. The places that produced these goods needed to become bigger and so factories started to grow and provided even more work for the growing population - even using children as workers.

Banking & Business

Entrepreneurs are businesspeople who are prepared to take the risk to invest their own money into a business with the hope of making lots more money from it. At the time, they will have bought raw materials (such as clay), made it into goods (such as tea pots) and then sold the goods for profit. At this time, there were many wealthy men who wanted to take a risk and begin their own businesses. Even more, the banks at the time were very happy to lend businessmen money as they could build new factories to make more goods.
