What is ADHD?

ADHD (Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder) is a neurodevelopmental difference that causes difficulties with brain processes that help the individual regulate themselves and surrounding resources to attain goals. These brain processes are called Executive Functions. The umbrella term, Executive Functioning, refers to self-regulatory behaviors such as attention, concentration, and focus, as well as task planning and initiation, transitioning from one task to the next, flexible problem solving, emotion regulation, impulse control, self-monitoring and organization.

There are three types of ADHD. The most common type is ADHD Combined type, which is when symptoms span the broad range of both attention regulation, organization, impulse control and hyperactivity. The ADHD Inattentive subtype is when individuals have mainly troubles with attention regulation and organization, while the ADHD Hyperactive subtype indicates predominantly difficulties with with hyperactivity and impulse control.
