

Managing Complexity while Building Consensus: How to govern the transition to a fair green future?

– Background Paper for UNDP's Oslo Governance Centre¹ –

Introduction

To avert climate collapse and achieve the global climate commitments, we know countries must reduce greenhouse (GHG) emissions and transition out of high carbon industries that are harming our environment.² While the pressure to cut GHG emissions is high, there are considerable social implications in how governments do this. If not managed well, societies are at risk to jeopardize their achievements with regard to social justice, human rights, gender equality, health, education, jobs and livelihoods.

Historically, there are examples of large-scale transitions, for instance due to economic reforms or technological change (starting with the Industrial Revolution), or due to shocks such as conflicts and more recently health crises. While those crises were often two-dimensional (e.g. economic-social), governments are now facing a significant and urgent challenge to address conflicting economic, environmental and social demands at the same time.

Consequently, just and green transition in any given country has the potential to question the existing social contracts and to demand entirely ones. Transitioning into a fair and green future requires moving towards a common vision that considers the benefits and losses from all perspectives. Against this background, it is timely to explore the governance challenges and opportunities that come with managing a transition to a fair, green economy. In other words: What governance challenges do we observe in a transition to a fair, green economy? And, in turn: How can effective governance help manage the tensions inherent in a transition to a fair, green economy? The present paper seeks to provide some initial background to start answering these questions.

“... transition in any given country has the potential to question the existing and to demand an entirely new social contract”

Current state of affairs

There is growing acceptance in governments that a just and green transition needs to be tackled in a coherent way and incorporated into policy frameworks.³ National Determined Contributions (NDCs) and Long-Term Strategies (LTSSs) have become important means through which governments are recognizing the principles of a just transition. According to the recent UNDP report ‘How Just Transition can Deliver the Paris Agreement’, a just transition is now referenced in around a third of the latest NDCs with an even split between developed and developing countries. Of the latest LTSSs submitted, around half of the strategies explicitly reference just transition and a growing

² Since the adoption of the Paris Agreement in 2015, countries have committed to both reducing emissions and adapting to climate change by means of Nationally Determined Contributions (NDCs) and Long Term Strategies (LTSSs), which outline their respective national approaches to fostering the environmental and economic transformation required to limit global temperature rise to 1.5 degrees Celsius or below.
