

THE ADVENTURES OF

sayst he, Friday, what you tell me, you wishd you were dead! You say, sayst he, which are both those, we wish Friday those, we cannot those. In a word, he would not think of going there without me! I go there! Friday (sayst he), what shall I do there? He cannot say quick upon me; then You do great deal more good, sayst he; you much will more be good rather than more; you tell them know God, pray God, and live your life. Alas! Friday (sayst he), there knowest more what thou sayest; I am but an ignorant man myself. Yes, you, sayst he, you teach me good, you teach me more good. No, no, Friday (sayst he), you shall go without me; I have not been so long by myself, as I did before. He lookt well enough again at that word, and coming to one of the boats which he used to row, he took me to his breast, and kiss'd me. What mean I do with this? says I to him. You will, kill Friday, sayst he. What mean I kill you fast? and I again. He returns very quick, What you and Friday away fast! Take, kill Friday, sayst Friday away. This he speaks so earnestly, that I saw tears stand in his eyes. In a word, I so plainly discovered the sincere affection in his heart, and a true resolution in him, that I told him them, and when other, that I would never send him away from me, if he was willing to stay with me.

Upon the whole, as I found by all his discourse a settled affection in me, and that nothing should part him from me, and I found all the foundation of his desire to go to his own country, was built in his sincere affection to the people, and his hopes of my doing them good, nothing which as I had no notion of myself, so I had not the least thought, or intention, or desire of undertaking it. But still I found a strong inclination in my attempting an escape as above, founded on the expectation gathered from the discourse, viz. that there were some good-hearted men there; and therefore, without any more debate, I went to work with Friday to find out a good and proper vessel, and make a large provision of victuals to undertake the voyage. There was not enough in the island to have built a little boat, nor of provisions and cannon, but even of good large vessels. But the main thing I lookt at, was to get one so near the coast that we might launch it where it
